Commentary

The K2 Global High Alpha Fund returned -1.2% for the month of March.

Risk assets across the globe continued to rally despite growing unease over a slowing global economy. Global bond yields have fallen to near record levels in most developed countries with over 50% of European bonds across the curve trading with negative yields. The key US yield curve inverted in March for the first time since 2007, which is historically a reliable forward indicator for a pending recession.

Despite clear discomfort, equity markets continued to power ahead driven by dovish global central banks with the MSCI AC World TR Net AUD Index increasing 1.4%. The US Federal Reserve has slashed its projected rate rises from two to zero, the ECB has extended its pledge on record low rates and the Chinese authorities continue to stimulate via monetary and fiscal policies. Given the significant cash on the sidelines, investors have added risk on the assumption that central banks will support equity prices and economies with their policy support. Deteriorating fundamentals and high valuations are currently being overlooked.

The Fund had a difficult month as numerous key stock holdings gave back recent gains generated over the last couple of months. We still have strong conviction on these stocks and nothing material changed over the month for these companies. Aeroplane manufacture, Boeing, however was exited during March following the crash of Ethiopian Airlines Flight 302 and subsequent grounding of all Boeing 737 Max aircraft.

The Fund remains fully unhedged at the currency level. With the AUD ending the month largely unchanged versus the USD, the Fund experienced only minor currency losses emanating from our long GBP and EUR positions. The Fund gradually increased exposure over the month and had a net equity exposure of 68.5% by month end.
